"At present in Virginia women are being admitted to all other State-supported educational institutions, with one exception. It is understood that the University of Virginia, and the College of William and Mary are finding women students satisfactory. In only six of the forty-eight States have women been dealed admission to the agricultural and mechanical colleges, these States heing Virginia, North Carolina, Florida, Mississippi and Texas, We are informed that in at least one of these States women have been admitted in small numbers. In South Carolina, Florida, Mississippi and Texas women's colleges have been developed as independent institutions. In meeting the need in Virginia it appears to be both logical and economical to admit women to this institution, where the advantages they seek are already provided.

advantages they seek are already provided.

"It is not probable that there would—at least for many years to come—be many women seeking admission here, but those who do so would need the type of work given at this particular institution, and they should not be denied the privilege of baving it. Our extension division already has a number of women on its staff of specialists and home demonstration agents. This includes a department of home economics for extension service."
